

Talking About Personal Finance – A Cure For Hypotension

Michael E. Lovelace, MBA, University of Louisville School of Medicine 2015 Family Medicine Leads Emerging Leader Institute Scholar

Introduction

The purpose of this project is to provide an easy to use personal finance tool for the medical student or resident with limited experience managing personal finances.

- · Personal finance classes are not required for premeds
- Average student loan debt $180,000¹
- · Excessive credit available due to earning potential
- · Poor decisions will impact family, career, and lifestyle

The issue of personal finance education is important to recruitment efforts because students are concerned they cannot afford to be Family Medicine physicians due to increasing student loan debt.^{2,3} By educating students about personal finance, these significant financial burdens can be viewed in proper context.

Design Requirements

- · Easy to use, limited to 35 questions
- Robust enough to be informative, but not overwhelming
 Adaptable to individual situations
- Reporting that identifies budget outliers

Benefits to Resident/Student

- · Better awareness of financial responsibilities
- More confident in financial future
- · Better prepared when making major purchases
- . Compare projected budgets based on city when interviewing
- More informed interaction with lenders, sales associates, realtors.
